desolation which met the eye on every hand was in the last degree oppressive. Everything speaks of poverty, bitter and unrelieved. Between these two banks is a great expanse of sand, dotted here and there with a few hovels of the same character as those on the embankment. I went down into one of these villages at the morning meal and examined their food. It is a combination of dry bean leaves (such as they commonly use for fuel) pulverized and millet chaff, the latter being a luxury which they can afford to use out sparingly. This, with water, is their only diet, except in special cases. It is need ess to say that with such nourishment as this many die of gradual starvation, coupled with cold and exposure. Great numbers from this region have scattered in various directions, having not even this food, and become vagrants, not from choice, but necessity. Turning towards the south the outlook is, it possible, recommend it. JACOB SWITZER.

"Proceeding along the embankment we meet families escaping from the district, wheeling all that remains of their goods on a small barrow. I recollect seeing one old man and his wife, both over 70 years of age, he wheeling the barrow and she with a rope over her; shoulder and staff in hand hobbling along, pulling the barrow to the best of her ability. Just as we passed their deep sighs of weariness and noted the worn expression of their wrinkled faces, I felt that theirs indeed was, a bitter lot, and could not but desire mensely to possess the ability and discretion to alleviate successfully their troubles."
